Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

St. Colman's Roman Catholic Church and Cemetery is located atop Sullivan's Knob on Irish Mountain, off West Virginia Secondary Route 26, in Richmond District, in a remote and isolated rural area of Raleigh County.

When St. Colman's was originally constructed in 1877-78, it was a hewn log structure. This is still evident in the hand hewn sills and joists that rest on large foundation stones. The log structure was covered in c.1928 by long clapboard wood siding that was, and is, painted white. The church building is a simple, rectangular one story structure surmounted by a standing seam gable metal roof. A large, unadorned wooden cross rises above the roof level at the front gable end. Large double doors, each containing five recessed panels, that open into the church are original features. There are six windows, three per side, that are double hung with six over six lights.

On the interior, there are twelve benches that are used by occasional worshippers. The alter is painted white, though the front of the alter contains two identical panels that have an encircled cross in their centers. A wood burning stove still provides heat. The alter and some of the benches were constructed in 1904 by Father J.J. Swint, who was a carpenter as well as priest, and later became Bishop of Wheeling.

The church occupies the front portion of the original one acre plot deeded by the diocese in 1876. The rear portion is occupied by the St. Colman's Cemetery, containing several dozen graves of Irish Mountain parishioners. Most graves are marked by upright grave stones of granite and marble (though some of sandstone) that contain inscriptions and epitaphs.

St. Colman's Church and Cemetery stand in a rural and isolated environment in which they clearly stand out as a local landmark of significance to southern West Virginia.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

St. Colman's Roman Catholic Church and Cemetery on Irish Mountain is significant as the sole surviving remains of a once thriving self-sufficient Irish immigrant population in the southern coalfields of West Virginia¹. It is also significant as the principal burying ground for the Irish immigrant community and as a prominent local landmark².

Explanatory Notes

1. Irish immigrants from the eastern United States began arriving in southern West Virginia in the early 1850's, coming to an area that was then a virtual wilderness. The first settler on Irish Mountain was Maurice Sullivan, who purchased 435 acres of land from the Gwinn family in 1855. By 1856 Sullivan had been joined by the Quinlan family, and in the decades that followed they were joined by McCarthy's, Dillions, Nee's, Carsons, and other Irish families. Located in an extremely isolated area, this community of Irish farmers became virtually self-sufficient and formed a distinctive ethnic group. The one aspect of their lives, however, in which they did not feel self-sufficient was their lack of a place of spiritual solace. The closest Roman Catholic church was St. Patrick Catholic Church in Hinton, founded in 1872, which was nearly fifteen miles away over torturous mountains and through rugged terrain. From 1872 on, the priest of St. Patrick's would journey to Irish Mountain once a month to hold services, but this was not adequate to the needs of the community.

By 1876, when the cemetery atop Irish Mountain had been consecrated and received the remains of John Quinlan, the movement to establish their own mission had become strong enough to receive the support of Bishop Joseph J. Kain, Bishop of the Wheeling Diocese. Bishop Kain was deeded, by Maurice Sullivan, one acre of land for the Irish Mountain Community in 1876, for the purpose of building a mission church and establishing a cemetery. Construction on the hewn log building began the following year and was named for a popular Gaelic-Irish Saint. By this time, some of the Irish Mountain farming community had left to work on the construction of the C & O Railroad, which reached Hinton in 1873.

The community at Irish Mountain continued to thrive on into the 20th century, with an average of fifteen to twenty families occupying the area. St. Colman's Church and Cemetery continued to be the focal point of the community. The church of St. Colman's never received its own priest, but continued to rely upon the Hinton parish for such services. About 1928 the old log structure was covered over by clapboard siding and painted white, giving the building the distinctive appearance that it retains today.

2. The St. Colman's Cemetery, to the rear of the church, became the principal burial ground for the Irish Mountain Community. The cemetery grew to contain rows of neat tombstones bearing such community names as McCarthy, O'Conner, Sullivan, Fitzpatrick, Gwinn, and so on. Many of the stones bear such revealing information as "Born, County Kerry, Ireland", and some contain interesting epitaphs. An example of these epitaphs, so reflective of the cultural values and religious beliefs of the Irish community, is carved on one gravestone of an early settler:

"Remember kind friends as you pass by,
As you are now, so once was I.
As I am now, so you must be.
Prepare for death, and follow me."

St. Colman's Cemetery has another interesting feature; a "Lost Corner", located in a rear corner of the cemetery. This small "Lost Corner" is un-consecrated ground and here are the graves of those infants or other individuals who died without benefit of baptism.

St. Colman's Church and Cemetery is today practically the only visible remains of the once thriving ethnic farming community on Irish Mountain. Sitting atop Sullivan's Knob, its prominence is unequaled by any other natural or built feature for many miles. Its significance was recognized locally when it was officially designated a Raleigh County Historical Landmark in September of 1983.
